Factsheet for Virginia's Parents Entering the Military after High School

Can I Enter the Military if I have a Disability?

Civilian, non-uniform member jobs within the Department of Defense (DoD), are subject to the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 which bars discrimination in employment (and other matters) by any entity that receives federal funding. There are many people with disabilities serving in all branches of the military in civilian positions. For information on civilian jobs see: <https://godefense.cpms.osd.mil/employment.aspx>

When it comes to serving in the military, the Armed Forces are not subject to the anti-discrimination requirements of the Americans with Disabilities (ADA). Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and Department of Defense regulations are also exempt from disability anti-discrimination policies and procedures. Court decisions have determined that the military's statutory (legal) authority to prescribe physical requirements for its members supersedes anti-discrimination laws (i.e., those laws don't apply). There is no requirement for any branch of the armed services to provide reasonable accommodations (e.g., extended testing time, reading questions aloud, physical readiness etc.). Military regulations also allow for the rejection of someone for service who has deficits (gaps) in academic skills that interfere with school or work after the age of 12.

Potential Disqualifications from Service in the Armed Forces

If you have a medical condition, you must disclose it to your recruiter who will be able to tell you whether or not the condition is a permanent disqualification, or a waiver can be requested. If you do not get an official waiver and your condition is discovered later, you will likely be dishonorably discharged for fraudulent (false) enlistment. There are many medical conditions that can disqualify you from service. For example, ADHD is a disqualifying condition if you have used medication within the last 12 months. Use of alcohol or drugs can also disqualify you depending on the substance used and when it was last used. <https://www.military.com/join-armed-forces/disqualifiers-medical-conditions.html>

Legal issues can disqualify you because moral character standards apply in the military. Some offenses (crimes) automatically disqualify you, but a waiver can be sought in other circumstances. Your credit history may also be a factor. For more information see: <https://www.military.com/join-armed-forces/disqualifiers-law.html>

How Do I Get a Waiver of a Military Entrance Requirement?

<https://www.thebalancecareers.com/waivers-for-joining-the-military-4052899>

Waivers for certain requirements are available but are not easy to obtain. There must be a strong reason to request a waiver and it is not guaranteed.

To seek a waiver, you must work with your recruiter. Once the request is submitted, someone higher in the chain of command must approve it. The more serious the waiver, the longer the approval will take.

Waivers for serious medical conditions or for criminal activity are difficult to obtain.

Waivers for things like color blindness may be easier to obtain in some branches of service, but you may not qualify for certain types of jobs. Medical issues that you have outgrown, like asthma or ADHD may be considered for a waiver.
